Successful co-teaching has demonstrated increased academic achievement for both students with and without disabilities. During this interactive workshop participants will learn how general and special education teachers can work together to differentiate instruction, reduce the student to teacher ratio, and engage all students in the general education classroom. Co-teaching models such as station teaching, parallel teaching, teaming, and split the class will be modeled and discussed. Come and learn the basics of setting up a schedule, co-planning, implementing practices, and problem solving. This information will assist teams with planning for successful implementation the upcoming school year.

Dr. Christi Kasa has been providing training and workshops, working with teachers to provide inclusive settings for students of all ability levels across the country. A former classroom teacher and inclusion facilitator, she is currently a professor at the University of Colorado, Colorado Springs. She has consulted in many school districts in Colorado. Christi's research interests include inclusive schooling, access to academics for students with significant disabilities, and access to meaningful communication. Christi is currently conducting a qualitative research project funded by the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services titled: The Early Childhood Literate Community: Supporting Citizenship for Young Children with Significant Disabilities.
